Portable Does that mean that one computer is in tune with the other one? Does that mean that a person who can hack into a computer can therefore access the data?

Does that mean that the firewall can not distinguish between the 2 computers? Or is it just the firewall has a different view of what is going on? PS: A friend of mine had a PC that was crashing (full of screen keeps flashing) and so he had bought a new HDD from the store. He tried to transfer the data from his old HDD to his new HDD but the HDD was dying out, so he was trying to see if he can repair the data on the old HDD. It turns out it was almost impossible. He had already lost half of his data. A: Does that mean that one computer is in tune with the other one? Does that mean that a person who can hack into a computer can therefore access the data? between the 2 computers? Or is it just the firewall has a different view of what is going on? If you are talking about "in tune with" for some sort of magic, it's just an accident of how the Internet is physically set up. The information available to you on either machine can be the same, it's just on one machine the interface to get the information is different. In your example, the old hard drive was physically damaged. The new hard drive you installed just "happened" to have a healthy copy of the data. The protective measures used by the operating system (partitioning, etc) may be identical, but the interface is different. does this mean that if a hacker can get to a computer, then they can get access to the data on that computer? No, it's not as simple as that. The operating system itself has two interfaces for "seeing" and "storing" the data. Also, you can have two computers, one installed with one operating system, and the other installed with a different operating system. Some data (user data) is stored on an area of the disk called the "partition". This is basically just the operating system
